The aristocrats never entered into competition for it; the hourgeois disdained it; the workingmen laughed at it. It has always been an appanage of domestic servnois. Their employers recommend them, the Institute investigates, selects, refers names and reasons to a committee. A member of the Academy whose good behavior is proverbial makes a speech and crowns the laureates with a laurel. They receive $100 each and engraved certificates of good behavior. A laureate of the Monthyon prize needs no other recommendation in France. Justine Chapel, one of this year's laurentes, is seventy-five years of age. She has been a domestic in one family since she was sixteen years of age. She has no desire to make use of a pension that her employers have placed to her credit in a bank. She has given her prize money to the poor and framed her certificate.

Auguste Fraenzel, the only man among the laurentes, is twenty-five years of age. In the hours when he is not at his service, in a fashionable house, he teaches German to two hundred children in a school of the Rue des Francs Bourgeois. The wages that the municipality gives to him as a teacher he spends in bringing up ten boys, orphans, of the district. They call him "Papa Fraenzel," and they are charming children,

The Doctor has entirely eliminated drastic drugs and poisons from his laboratory. He considers that they kill far more than they cure. He uses only the mildest of preparations, but as they are freshly prepared and put up in his own laboratories, thus they contain much more of the active principle of the drug than a much larger dose of an old, stale preparation that has been standing in some druggist's prescription case for months. When a drug becomes stale it loses its healing properties, and in the process of fermentation and decay which takes place after g forgotten, has had to hire a it has been prepared some time, injurious and even poisonous properties are often formed. Adulterated and retary to handle his mail, which stale and inert drugs is one of the obstacles the physician who writes prescriptions has to contend with.
